

Participating in Research at JWCI

You may know that research is a central part of the mission of the John Wayne Cancer Institute (JWCI). Over the years, our doctors and scientists have made discoveries and treatment advances that are benefiting patients around the world today, achievements that would not have been possible without the involvement of many patients who chose to participate in the research.

Our mission continues with ongoing research that we hope will make progress toward improvements in care and treatment for future patients. Today, your doctor may discuss with you the option of participating in our research. This might involve enrolling in a clinical trial evaluating a new treatment or medication. It might involve donation of a specimen (such as a blood sample) for research.

All participation is completely voluntary, and we will make sure the details of any research (including potential benefits & risks) are clear to you.

Please be sure any questions you have are answered by your doctor or our research staff.
